But since there is no other organization to take its place, the national Democracy must and will unite on some national platform embracing the essence of the eternal principles first promulgated by Jefferson, and illustrated by Jackson. It will go to pieces if it betray the generous principles and aspirations which not only gave it a name, but life and hopor and triumph. When its soul flies away the body will fall a prey to the worms and creeping things that are born in rottenness and decay. It must look for new vigor, not to factions, combinations and conspiracies, but to a recurrence to its ancient inspirations, those eternal principles which cannot die and the republic live. It must put itself squarely before the people on a ground that will justify its name—on the ground of a positive, consistent and unyielding creed, with such modifications only as the changed circumstances of the times demand.
